Course description

Western depictions of contemporary sub-Saharan Africa are dominated by images of famine, refugees, child soldiers, corruption, and crushing poverty. In this course, rather than shy away from such images, we will engage with them head-on through an anthropological lens—the better to confront and transcend prejudices about a portion of humanity long seen as monolithic despite its tremendous cultural diversity. As we read local-level ethnographic accounts, analyses of continent-wide developments by Western and African scholars, and some African fiction, we will consider a range of questions including: How do ordinary Africans cope with problems such as food scarcity, political violence, AIDS, and corrupt government? How do issues of identity and belonging affect life in modern African countries? Where does Africa fit into the current neoliberal world order? And what role, if any, does “African culture” play in shaping all these issues? For millions of Africans, these are not “academic questions” but matters of life and death. Using contemporary studies and current events to explore these questions, we will strive to replace stereotyped generalizations and objectifications of the continent with practical knowledge for understanding events and transformations underway in African societies.

Course goals

The course seeks to use anthropological research and analysis to help students explore several of the complex problems facing African societies today. At the end of the semester, students should be able to:
• apply a set of analytical tools (including various aspects of critical and social theory) to analyze events in sub-Saharan Africa;
• apply inductive and deductive reasoning to a broad range of social issues using specific African case-studies; and
• participate critically in contemporary public debate about African problems and Africa’s place in the world.

Course format

This is a course designed to enable students to play an active role in their own learning experience. Most class sessions will include presentations by the instructor as well as interactive exercises. Students will also participate in weekly discussion sections outside of course lectures.
Student assessment
Students are expected to read the required texts, to play an active part in regular class discussions, and to complete written/oral assignments in a timely manner. Student performance on assignments will be evaluated with respect to the course goals outlined above (see grading rubric for details). Assignments will be weighted as follows:
• Section attendance & participation 15% of course grade
• One group presentation to class 15% of course grade
• Three short essays 30% of course grade
• Final research project 40% of course grade

Class participation: Please come to discussion section meetings punctually and prepared. To make for fruitful discussion of the week’s text, please prepare two written observations or questions which have come to mind through your reading. You’re always encouraged to be critical in your approach to these readings, though it’s useful to look at a text’s strong points as well as its weaknesses. More than one absence during the semester will adversely affect your grade. Students will also independently monitor African current events via the Web and be prepared to discuss them in class.

Group presentation: This will be a 7-10 minute briefing to the class about an African country or issue. Students will sign up on-line for presentation groups by date and subject, and their performance will be evaluated by their peers. See website for details.

Response papers: Write three 3-4 pp. critical responses to reading assignments (you may choose to concentrate on one text alone, or compare it to other readings). Note that you must submit a response paper about a particular reading during the week that reading is due. The first must be turned in by the week of February 12, the next by the week of March 20, and the last by the week of April 24.

Research project: This will be a 15-20 pp. paper on a subject of your choosing. You must meet or e-mail with the instructor or TA to discuss your topic by March 13. Grading criteria will be provided on the website.

Guidelines for learning and participating in this course:
• Be enthusiastic and respectful during class lectures and discussion.
• Follow rules of academic honesty (i.e. cite correctly and do not plagiarize).
• Follow anthropological citation style in your written work; see course texts for examples.
• If you have a disability that affects your ability to participate fully in class or to meet all course requirements, please tell me at the beginning of the term so that we can make appropriate accommodations.
• If you have any other concerns which merit special consideration (e.g. little/no anthropology background, not a native speaker of English, special family circumstances), please also bring this to my attention early in term.
• Hand in assignments and be prepared for oral presentations on time. If you talk to me before the due date about extenuating circumstances, I will try to accommodate your needs within the bounds of fairness.

Required texts
Most of our readings will be drawn from anthropological monographs, i.e. book-length, in-depth studies of particular subjects. Students should read these monographs in their entirety unless otherwise instructed. The following titles will be available from the Brown University Bookstore:

Additional readings, including selected journal articles and book chapters, are available for download via E-Reserves (OCRA) on the course website. These include:
